Claude Lévi-Strauss (1908-2009) was a French social anthropologist and ethnologist who was an important figure in the development of Structuralism. He wrote in the Preface to this 1962 book, "This book is complete in itself, but the problems it discusses are closely linked to those which I surveyed more hastily in a recent work entitled 'Totemism.'

(219) Savage thought, Lévi-Strauss argues, continually gathers and applies structures wherever they can be used. If scientific thought is represented by the engineer who asks a question and tries to design an optimal or complete solution, savage thought resembles the bricoleur, who constructs things using whatever materials are at hand.
